The Merino sheep of which there are several varieties -- the Saxon, the French, and the Spanish-came originally from Spain, and were no doubt known to and appreciated by the Greeks and Romans. They have the finest wool of the whole genus, and a great quantity to the weight of the careass. As mutton they are quite nice in flavor, though inferior to many other breeds as flesh bearers, being deficient in the fine points of the carcass "The fine: the wool the finer the mutton," an old saying. does not seem to be contradicted by the Merino, the quantity and not the quality being deficient. And although the Merino has in the last century doubled its weight of carcass as well as of woo!, the increasing demand for mutton must give it a second place. The facility of transporting wool is so much greater than that of flesh that wool growing must be more and more confined to distant and comparatively barbarous lands; whilst the mutton sheep must take their places near the centers of population and consumption. America can claim the credit of having made the greatest improvement in this fine breed of sheep; and New England among the States up to this time perhaps has a claim to pre-eminence in this culture. But there is still room for advance
